Smear your challenger or check out what matters to the people in your district? These are the two approaches to the campaign for Congressional District 4 (story May 5).

Rep. Tom McClintock has been in Congress for five years and has gotten two post offices named. His voting record is 100% Big Money (the Washington, D.C., groups that give him a high rating are now mostly funded by the super rich). He voted against the Farm Bill and the Defense Bill. His Town Hall meetings don't mean much since he listens only to people who say what he wants to hear. So, hardly anyone came to his last meeting in Oakhurst. His campaign strategy is to make up phony stories about his challenger, because he can't campaign on what he has done.

Art Moore has been traveling around the district asking people about their concerns. A friend met him at a local business and was very impressed by Moore as a clear-eyed, straightforward person who listens. And Moore would not have voted to shut down the government. His campaign emphasizes working to deliver results.

We need an achiever in Congress, not a naysayer.
